To be told that thrift is not almost one of the cardinal virtues sounds like heresy, yet that is what Mrs. Corinne S. Brown recently declared before an intellectual audience composed chiefly of women at the Social Economics club. From time out of mind thrifty persons have been pointed out as models for those ambitious to achieve success.

The dictionary informs us that thrift the pursuit of gain, profit, frugality, savingness, good husbandry." With all "Political Economy Versus Social start the work in that city. Mrs. Her-Economics." bert Parsons, director of the Children's "Political economy,' 'said Mrs. Brown, 'seeks to justify the present organization of society and deals with things and the laws of their distribution under existing conditions. Social economy deals with people, their advancement, their rights. It acknowledges the growth and development of society. subordinates things to people and val-ues human life as the supreme aim of social adjustment. Political economy assumes that the wage system is the natural and only method of production, while social economics concede that it is a natural method because it is the one which has been developed out of other forms of production, but it has not been in existence long as compared with the life of men, and it is demonstrating its own decline because under men cannot supply their wants. Political economy avers that the ori-gin of capital—and by capital is meant the private ewnership of land and machinery, and the consequent depend-ence of the many on the few-is the result of thrift, saving and enterprise, but social economy declares the necessity for saving is a poor argument to justify present conditions, Thrift and saving are anti-social in character, and do more harm socially than good. There is a difference be-tween economy and thrift. Economy means an expenditure suitable to secur-ing the largest and best returns, whereas thrift is too often a sacrifice of the best to the poorest in us, a denying of our highest ideals to secure some lower good. That we are forced to do this is no argument for its perpetuation. Econ-ony sometimes may mean the most reckless expenditure in order that some great and ultimate good may be accomplished. Witness the drainage canal, the public school system, etc. "Thrift tends to become parsimony and cannot be practised without injur-ing some one else. The woman who goes without the ribbons she wants simply takes work away from some other woman who makes ribbons. Thrift falls of its purpose when wide-ly practised, for under the wage system the whole fight is to raise the standard of living, and he who lowers that stand-ard of living, and he who lowers that standard becomes a social enemy. If thrift was necessary in the past, the world is now far enough advanced to discard it. In a word, the practise of saving is a necessary evil forced on us by wrong social conditions. The really useful people, those who do most for humanity, are not thrifty," The rest of Mrs. Brown's address was along the well-known lines of socialism, "Social economics," she declared, would restore to the people, with half the improvements which have grown along with our increasing intelligence, the land and tools, so that all the peo-ple can have all they need or want. while political economy argues for the sacredness of human life and well-being and will admit no right which impertis the continuation of the humblest per-son's existence. The one everlasting indictment of private ownership in land and tools, the unanswerable charge against trade and commercialism, that human life is not preserved under its reign. On the contrary, life is sacrificed to mere property everywhere in a land containing resources not yet even "Only by makingeach one's interest the social interest, and the social gain the individual gain, can we live at all. It seems to me that anyone with the power to think broadly may see that in a world which contains all we need to live upon, filled with intelligence as expressed in our machinery, inventions and discoveries, we are close to the point of evolving into a state of society in which each one's effort will be a perceptible benefit to everybody, and in which everybody will realize that an injustice to any one is an injury to al

The spread of the school garden idea the pursuit of gain, profit. Pugality, savingness, good husbandry." With all has been most gratifying lately. As those points to its credit, how could thrift be other than a distinct virtue? Let Mrs. Brown answer. To give her words in their proper setting it should be stated that she was speaking on

School Farm, DeWitt Clinton Park, described the success of her labors in New York. Her account of how the children of the tenements, whose previous knowledge of plant life had been drawn from observation of pushcarts and green grocers' shops, have become the possessors of a model farm was listened to with sympathetic attention. Herbert D. Heminway, director of the Hartford School of Horticulture, in a history of the movement, which began in Dayton, O., said: "These gardens have been carried on for six or eight years, and it has been found that the boys working in them were 30 per cent more rapid in physical, mental, and moral development than the boys of the same neighborhood who had no gar-dens. The boys were formerly known as the "Slidertown Toughs," and made their locality so unpopular that build-ing lots sold for $300 and $400 apiece. That they are now worth from $900 to $1,500 apiece will show something of what the boys' gardens will have done towards developing the best traits."

After that it must have been both discouraging and inspiring to the associa-tion to hear from the chairman of the committee on summer playgrounds of the board of education, who warned them that in view of the many school needs he did not think it possible to se-cure an appropriation for a school gar-
